code meaning

An employee may apply to the comptroller for compensation if the employee has made an invention belonging to the employer for which a patent has been granted and that the patent is of such outstanding benefit to the employer that it is just that the employee should be awarded compensation to be paid by the employer. The comptroller must determine that the patent was made by and belongs to the employee, the employee's rights have been consigned to the employer and the benefit to the employee is inadequate. The comptroller may request the Court to deal with the application.
